What is a polynucleotide?

A Polynucleotide is a polymeric chain of mononucleotides.

Benefits of polynucleotide:

- Stimulate Cell proliferation
- Regenerative
- Synthesis of collagen and elastin
- Synthesis of hyaluronic acid
- Induced angiogenesis
- Melanogenesis inhibition
- Anti inflammatory effect
- Restore fibroblast biosynthetic activity
- Wound healing
- Scar improvement

How does it work?

It increases the rate of cell proliferation with further enhancement of fibroblast (increased collagen). It also promotes the proliferation of pre-adipocytes which are good for the immune system.

What is it made from?

It contains salmon / trout sperm – so is not suitable for vegans.

Who is it good for?

People with the following skin conditions:

- Dehydrated and damaged skin
- Acne – atrophic scars
- Androgenetic alopecia, hair loss and thinning hair

It also benefits people before and after surgery including hair transplant.

What is the difference between polynucleotides and proffilo?

- Polynucleotide is a regenerative medicine tool not a skin booster.
- Proffilo is more hydrating and adds volume and lift.
- Polynucleotides are better for bad skin with increased longevity of effects of fixing this skin.

In conclusion – you can have either, at present we do not favour any. I am at the stage of my second treatment out of 4 of polynucleotides so difficult to say.

I'm having both! You can have both – you can alternate every three months between the two, or you can switch to the dual syringe which has some hyaluronic acid it (like proffilo) and some polynucleotides (just remember that when opting for this one the quantities are not as much as separate treatments).

How many treatments do I need?

Four treatments 3-4 weeks apart then maintenance of one syringe every 6 months

What areas can be treated?

- Eyes, including eyelids.
- Face
- Neck
- Decolletage
- Hands
- Body
- Scalp

Is it painful?

Yes – however we can use lidocaine in the area first as local anaesthetic in the form of cream or injection – I had this and never hardly felt it.
